Excerpt from Proceedings of the New York Pathological Society: Review of Recent Cancer Research The recent advances made in our knowledge of cancer may be grouped together according as they have been obtained by statistical or by experimental methods. In this first lecture I shall direct your attention to the results which have been obtained by improving the national statistics of England instead of taking a separate cancer census as was done in Germany and other countries, and to certain other statistical observations. In the second lecture I shall discuss the results of experiments. A few general remarks are necessary to introduce the statistical details. It is essential that the great frequency of cancer should be borne in mind, because this of itself explains why aggregations of cases are bound to occur. Cancer is so frequent in England that one out of every seven women and one out of less than every eleven men above the age of 35, ultimately dies of it. On this basis it is possible to calculate how often one, two, three, or more, cases of cancer may be expected in a family. Of 100 families each of six members, 3 males and 3 females, no case of cancer would be expected in 51, one case would be expected in 36, two cases in 11, and 3 or more cases in 2 families. Of 100 families of eight members, four women and four men, no case would occur in 41, one in 39, 2 in 16 and 3 or more in four families. In 100 families of ten members, five men and five women, only 33 would be expected to escape altogether, whereas there would be one...
