Excerpt from A Sermon, Preached in Boston, August 20, 1812, the Day of Humiliation and Prayer: Appointed by the President of the United States, in Consequence of the Declaration of War Against Great Britain Our condition induces me to begin, with urging on you the important duty of cherishing respect for civil government, and a spirit of obedience to the laws. I am sensible, that many whom I address consider themselves called to Oppose the measures of our present rulers. Let this opposition breathe nothing of insubordination, impatience of authority, or love of change. It becomes you to remember, that government is one of the noblest and most valuable of human institutions - essential to the improvement of our nature - the spring of industry and enterprise - the shield of property and life - the refuge of the weak and oppressed. It is to the security which laws afford, that we owe the successful application of human powers - the progress of the useful and elegant arts - the Splendour of the city and the beauties of the cultivated field. Government, I know, has often been perverted by ambition and other selfish passions; but it still holds a distinguished rank among those institutions, by which man has been rescued from barbarism, and conducted through the ruder stages of society, to the habits of order, the diversified employments and dependences, the refined and softened manners, the intellectual, moral and religious improvements of the age in which we live. We are bound to respect government, as the foundation of the social edifice - the great security for social happiness and we should carefully cherish that habit of...
